This social history project is a collection of photographs that tells a story of identity, history, culture and shows the deep roots of Traveller Pride in Donegal throughout the COVID-19 pandemic. As a Human Rights activist and Traveller woman it is important to celebrate and promote our culture and history. The Traveller community is poorly documented throughout Irish History and this social history book tells a story through photographs of Travellers living through COVID-19 and shows Travellers in Donegal standing together in solidarity to protect Traveller culture and history.

This collection celebrates Traveller women, Traveller men and Traveller children and young people and our Elders at every level of this project. This collection of photographs puts a value on the traditions and culture of the Traveller community in particular exploring the importance of religion, identity and heritage across Donegal.

The struggle for Traveller rights makes us who we are today – a resilient community who has protected our culture and identity over decades. Knowing our history shows us who we are, our strengths and where we came from as a distinct minority ethnic community. We need to know our past to build our future so we can continue to work towards creating a more equal society where Traveller history and culture is celebrated and respected. The bonds of community, family and friends hold us altogether and create the invisible threads that connects us as the Traveller community.

As a community, we still continue to experience racism, discrimination, poverty, isolation and marginalisation and throughout the pandemic these inequalities experienced by the Traveller community have become further exacerbated. However, despite these ongoing challenges, I have seen the resilience, strength, pride and commitment to family and community across many Traveller families. As Travellers we are still here and still standing as a distinct minority proud of each other and our culture and this book shows this sense of Traveller Pride. This collection is important as a social history project as it has created a history of the Traveller Community in Donegal.

Traveller Pride represents standing together in solidarity in celebrating our culture, heritage and history. Our photographs demonstrate our distinctness and the diversity within the community. We value the ‘art of thinking independently together’ which has been significantly influenced by our nomadic traditions.

The Traveller community continually lives in a wave of a storm, which is racism and these storms have not eroded our identity but they have enabled our community to develop deeper roots to resist assimilation and to maintain, protect and love our distinct culture, heritage and community.

I want to thank members of the Traveller community throughout Donegal for participating on this project and wish them best health and happiness for all members of their families and the broader Traveller Community.

In the words of Maya Angelou ‘We should know that diversity makes for a rich tapestry and we must understand that all the threads of the tapestry are equal in value, no matter what their colour’.

TRAVELLER HISTORY

Dr. Rosaleen McDonagh

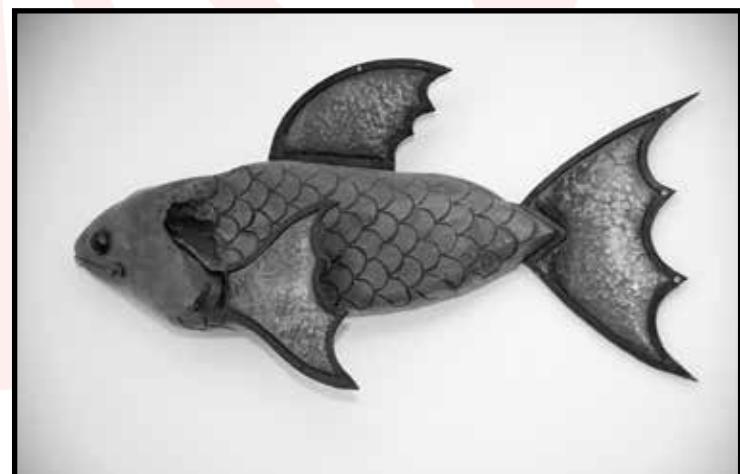

Curating Traveller history will be painful. That pain will be felt by the Traveller and the settled listener. It won't be easy for both communities to listen and to be heard. That settled voice can no longer be considered the centre. There will be no more editing, erasing, diminishing, questioning or accusing.

The task of excavating our history can only be done by our young people. A generation that is bound up in Traveller identity and Traveller heritage. People that stretch and pull the elasticity of Traveller ethnicity. Accuracy comes from authenticity. The analysis is only for the spectator. The ephemeral cultural debris of our lives must be gathered. The evictions, the violence, segregated education, the loss of opportunity, the loss of possibility, the loss of life, these circumstances must be spoken of. Disposable lives. Lives that were not afforded status and citizenship. Lives that were often undocumented. The personal becomes the political. The political becomes the collective. Varied voices, dispersed experiences, memories bring their own punishment. The guilt, the shame. The shame of being shamed. Acknowledgement brings an unspoken respect. Formal history inferred our inferiority, that we were subjects of settled memory and artifacts. Our songs, music and stories were the reference for Irish Travellers. The add on, the appendix, the footnote.

The resilient generations before us articulated and carried history through oralism. The story, the voice, the whisper, the song, the lament grounded in particular locations throughout our country. The power, the parallel, the divide, evidence of oppression. The resistance, the outsider, a positioning that placed us in the wilderness. The isolation, the alienation, ethnic cleansing, slow incremental punishment at its worst. Irish identity is not linear, it has many hidden histories. Traveller history being one. That continues to unfold outside the perimeters of the written word. History may well be one damn thing after another. Traveller ethnicity has always been slippery, tangled up with Irish identity. The superior and inferior roles ascribed tells a certain type of story. The object, the Traveller is now the subject. Our agency, our autonomy ensures history is not just about winners and losers but about those of us who shaped and coloured this country of ours.
